

Keyword: global-warming

Headline: Tennis in a sauna? Heat wave hits Australian Open

Byline: Associated Press

Published Date: 08:25 PM January 14, 2014

Section: sports

Word Count: 642

Content:

Tennis fans protect themselves from the sun during a first round match at the Australian Open tennis championship in Melbourne, Australia, Tuesday, Jan. 14, 2014. AP

Tennis fans protect themselves from the sun during a first round match at the Australian Open tennis championship in Melbourne, Australia, Tuesday, Jan. 14, 2014. AP

MELBOURNE, Australia — One player fainted mid-match as temperatures topped 42C (108F) at the Australian Open on Tuesday. Others said it felt like they were playing tennis in a sauna, or on a frying pan that sizzled their soles.

The scorching heat on Day 2 thinned crowds at Melbourne Park and prompted players to cool off between points with bags of ice on their heads or draped over their necks. Little relief was expected this week, with similar heat forecast until Friday

Canadian qualifier Frank Dancevic said he started feeling dizzy in the first set of his match against Benoit Paire and then collapsed in the next set.

"I couldn't keep my balance anymore and I leaned over the fence, and when I woke up people were all around me," he said. After receiving medical attention, he returned to the match and lost in straight sets.

"It's hazardous to be out there. It's dangerous," Dancevic said, criticizing the tournament for not having suspended play. "Until somebody dies, they're just going to keep playing matches in this heat."

The tournament has not yet invoked its "Extreme Heat Policy," saying the decision is based on a quotient of air temperature, humidity and wind speed.

Officials have played down health risks, saying the majority of matches were completed without calls for medical attention.

"Of course there were a few players who experienced heat-related illness or discomfort, but none required significant medical intervention after they had completed their match," Tim Wood, the tournament's chief medical officer, said in a statement.

A ball girl was treated for heat stress during a morning match, and the tournament shortened rotations for the ball kids to 45-minute shifts.

Players used metaphors and anecdotes to describe how hot it was.

"I put the (water) bottle down on the court and it started melting a little bit underneath — the plastic. So you know it was warm," former No. 1-ranked Caroline Wozniacki said. "It felt like I was playing in a sauna."

Wozniacki was luckier than most. She had a straight sets win in the morning when it was 38C (100F).

Sometimes a hot breeze stirred the air, making things worse, said No. 13-seeded John Isner, who retired from his first-round match with a right ankle injury.

"It was like an oven — when I open the oven and the potatoes are done. That's what it's like," Isner said.

Two-time defending champion Victoria Azarenka agreed.

"It felt pretty hot, like you're dancing in a frying pan or something like that," she said after advancing to the second round.

Always cool under pressure, Roger Federer avoided touching the hot ground at changeovers by sitting on his bench with his feet up on a towel. The 17-time Grand Slam winner advanced to the second round, saying for him the heat was "just a mental thing."

No. 4 Andy Murray struck a more sober tone.

"As much as it's easy to say the conditions are safe," Murray said, "It only takes one bad thing to happen."

"It looks terrible for the whole sport when people are collapsing, ball kids are collapsing, people in the stands are collapsing," the Wimbledon champion said. "That's obviously not great."

RELATED STORIES;

Aussie Open: Nadal joins Federer in 2nd round

Hewitt loses 1st-round match at Australian Open

Del Potro beats qualifier Williams at Aussie Open

Subscribe to our daily newsletter

By providing an email address. I agree to the Terms of Use and acknowledge that I have read the Privacy Policy.

Murray wins 1st-round match at Australian Open